Acknowledgments

I would like to thank University College Dublin, and its Classics Department, especially Andrew Smith, for allowing me to take two periods of sabbatical leave, in Germany and the United States, without which this book would still be merely a file of notes. In Munich Franz Tinnefeld gave very useful advice on an early draft. In New York Alan Camaron told me all I needed to know to survive in Manhattan, lent me a bike, and gave scholarly comments on my work. I cannot imagine what would have happened to me without his hospitality and that of the Classics Department of Columbia University. I am also indebted to Richard Price, not only for his invaluable translation of the Religious History but for his wise and learned remarks on what I wrote. Kieran Allen, Kevin Cathcart, Jan Willem Drijvers, Andrew Erskine, and Marina Greatrex also waded their way patiently through versions of this work and offered constructive criticism when it was much needed. I am also indebted to two anonymous readers for the University of Michigan Press for their advice. All errors are of my own creation.

Vic Connerty, Jeanne Glenz, Mary Holland, Gwen Ellison, Barbara Forbes, Scott Fraser, Catherine Johnston, and Catherine O'Dea all kept me going in the right direction. No one could wish for a more enthusiastic and encouraging editor than Collin Ganio and I am extremely grateful to him for enthusing me when I was getting a little tired of Theodoret.

It is thanks to my family that I have always understood why some people might wish to flee human society forever. It is only relatively recently, however, that I have gained some grasp of why anyone might have the urge to write hagiography, and I dedicate this book to two modern equivalents of holy women.
