I first became interested in Pindar in the winter of 1997, when a Postdoctoral Mellon Fellowship at Stanford University gave me the opportunity to teach a graduate seminar on epinician poetry. It seems fitting that my first thanks should go to the graduate students in that class—in particular, to Holly Coty, Renie Henchy, and Cashman Prince. I remain grateful to them for their insights and enthusiasm, and for the thought-provoking discussions that took place both inside and outside the classroom.

I am equally indebted to the many other colleagues and friends at Stanford, at Rice, and elsewhere for the careful reading, thoughtful suggestions, and encouragement they provided at every stage of the work. In particular, I thank Mark Edwards, James Houlihan, Richard Martin, John McNamara, Gregory Nagy, Kate Pogue, and Ruth Scodel. I am also grateful to Terry Munisteri for her invaluable help in preparing the manuscript for publication.

Citations of Pindar are taken from the Teubner text (B. Snell, ed. Pindari Carmina cum Fragmentis. Leipzig: Teubner, 1987). Translations from Pindar are my own; translations of the Iliad and Odyssey are taken or adapted from Richmond Lattimore's The Iliad of Homer, copyright by the University of Chicago Press, 1951, and Richmond Lattimore's The Odyssey of Homer (New York: Harper and Row, 1967).
